The development of performance management systems for the health care industry has begun. Although different approaches to performance management have begun to emerge as a result of these efforts, few truly state-of-the-art approaches are yet known. Moreover, little research exists on the actual performance of hospitals' performance management systems. A critical challenge in establishing performance management systems is to ensure that the appropriate requirements are met for the system to function. These requirements will likely include the following: Interactivity. It will be important to ensure that users can at least modify key input variables in real time. Structured data. Data must be available in the same format, and the format must be readily understandable by the user. Flexibility. The framework of the performance management system needs to accommodate the fact that stakeholders and expectations are likely to change over time. These concerns will play a key role in the creation and design of performance management systems as they relate to hospitals.Q: How can I apply multiple file extensions to a directory? Q: ASP.NET Page reload after HTML5 Video element update I am programming a website for an Academy of English (Japan) - they have a system in which the main page is fully in English, the sub-pages are in Japanese, and on every main page there is a sub-page to go to. They asked me that if I could use an HTML5 element to play the video in the main page, while updating the video from the sub-page. It is not something I have tried yet, but I wanted to know if anyone here had some experience of this kind of thing. I know I will have to reference the source video and have it play whenever the main page is loaded, but every time there is a postback or anything, can I have the main page reload again, without losing the video that is playing and is not currently on the page? Is this possible? Thanks for your help, even if there is no possibility
