Tuesday, 10 January 2010 For those who have been following the scores of projects on "Google docs" I am becoming more and more impressed by their professional look and the quality of the content. Finally a free site that offers the same quality as the paid one's. Google docs has benefited from users like me who need a simple way to display some information, without having to resort to complex presentations. A cool feature is the "email Google docs" where you can just upload your files with a link to them, and share them with your friends. As this is a site which offers free services it's not a shock that there are ads of various kinds. And the one which comes preinstalled in Firefox (with the video ads) is worth watching. Nice to see Microsoft still investing in their browser, something which Google is trying to thwart with chrome. Wednesday, 4 January 2010 I was looking for a twitter client for my laptop. I normally use the Ubuntu one which is pretty good. But on my main PC it doesn't always work, this one looks simple and clean, and you can see the tweets in a pretty normal timeline. And a big plus is the option to group tweets together and read a thread from the beginning. Matrix compression of the placenta in the rat. The mass of the placenta per gravid body weight was determined in pregnant rats on the day prior to calving and on Days 1, 2, 5, 7, 11, 14, 16, and 18 postpartum. The fetal fraction of placental wet mass decreased during early lactation (Days 1 to 11). The extent of this decrease was associated with the decrease of the mass of the fetal component of the placenta. It seems that the fetal component of the placenta contracts in early lactation, and that the placenta
