To do this I have to connect to the server via the command line but to connect you need the MySQL username and password. We don't really want people to know this is what's running so I wanted to know if there was a way to allow a password to be set remotely by a user? One thing I tried was using PHP's mysqli_connect to connect to the server but to do this you have to manually add the user and password. A: No, there's no way to set a user's password by users other than you. With you, the operator, you can. As you've pointed out, you'll need to have his/her credentials to use mysqli. If you can control the server side, I'd suggest writing a Python/PHP script that makes the call to your PHP script. Your PHP script would make the connection for you and give you the ability to change the user's password. If you can't control the server, then there's very little you can do. Q: Split a string into multiple parts in Ruby I have the following piece of code in Ruby: string = "hello blabla my name is jack" string.split(/hello/) I'm expecting the result to be Array(["hello"], ["blabla"], ["my name is jack"]), but 595f342e71
