This double-exposure photo shows two rare species of African aardvark: the West African dwarf aardvark (Antidorcas marsupialis dorcas) and the central African dwarf aardvark (Antidorcas marsupialis ogouensis). Photos from the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources (IUCN). On Friday (July 18), biologists in Ethiopia announced the discovery of a new species of aardvark. Experts hailed the find as "a significant advancement" for the study of the animal, which they say has been largely undocumented since the 19th century. The newly identified species is a relative of the rock hyrax, another medium-sized mammal that is found across Africa and Asia.
