download rab ne bana di jodi tamil dubbed movie Normal diastolic aortic valve pressure gradient: diastolic flow changes in the descending thoracic aorta at rest and during exercise. We have measured aortic valve pressure gradients by Doppler ultrasound at rest and during exercise in 51 normal volunteers (age, 32 +/- 1 years; range, 21 to 44; body surface area, 1.73 +/- 0.08 m²). All aortic valve areas were normal (1.57 +/- 0.15 cm²) in the 51 asymptomatic patients. A normal diastolic aortic valve pressure gradient at rest (group A) was defined as a gradation value less than 15 mm Hg and a peak gradation of less than 20 mm Hg at exercise. The modal peak gradation value was 18 mm Hg. Echocardiographically, the pressure gradient was significantly lower (P less than.001) when the flow velocity across the aortic valve decreased (less than 10 cm/sec) than when the flow velocity across the aortic valve increased (greater than 10 cm/sec).
The exercise pressure gradation value was higher (P less than.001) and the increase in pressure gradation was less (P less than.001) when the velocity across the valve increased (greater than 10 cm/sec) than when it decreased (less than 10 cm/sec). There was no statistical difference in systolic or diastolic exercise gradation values between those with high and normal coronary pressure. The end-diastolic pressure gradient across the mitral valve at rest was not correlated with the peak systolic pressure gradient across the aortic valve. The diastolic coronary pressure gradient correlated with the increased peak systolic pressure gradient across the aortic valve during exercise (r =.451, P less than.01). The aortic valve pressure gradient at rest was significantly lower (P less than.02) in the group who had coronary artery stenosis (group B) than in the group who did not (group A), as was the increase in pressure gradient during exercise (P less than.05).(ABSTRACT TRUNCATED AT 250 WORDS)Permanent lesions of the lower extremity
