Monoamine transporters are important for the storage and release of monoamines from presynaptic neurons and are found in rodent brain and central nervous system (CNS) tissues including the placenta. Here we present a detailed examination of mouse placenta, where the serotonin transporter (SERT) is known to be absent, with special reference to the monoamine transporter 1 (MAT1). We find that MAT1 is absent in mouse placenta at all stages of embryonic and postnatal development, but is expressed in mouse CNS (cerebellum and hippocampus) at all ages examined. SERT is expressed in mouse placenta from day 13 of gestation until term. By conducting knockout analyses with mouse lines deficient in SERT and MAT1, we determine that MAT1 is the principle transporter of both noradrenaline and serotonin in mouse placenta. A mutation in MAT1 that prevents transport activity of serotonin also abolishes the ability of 5-hydroxytryptophan, the precursor to serotonin, to support development of mouse placenta in utero, suggesting a major role for MAT1 in serotonin synthesis in placenta. However, a placenta-specific knockout of MAT1 is surprisingly viable and has no discernible behavioral or neurological effects. By contrast, the lack of SERT in mouse placenta results in a delay in postnatal growth, reduced offspring numbers, and behavioral effects in the offspring with regard to hyperlocomotion in response to methylphenidate, a potent dopamine reuptake inhibitor.Q: Ajax / PHP - POST - no updates I have a website with a few pages, some of which have AJAX functionality to update a mysql database.
