In cases of benign or malignant tumours of the mandible the radical removal of the bone that is necessary for a complete resection can be associated with disruption of the mandibular plane, occlusal dysfunction and facial disfigurement. Although these complications can be successfully treated in an interdisciplinary approach, the quality of the surgery is a major determinant of the course of the healing process. However, this does not apply for irradiation, as the effects of the radiation are restricted to a defined area of the jaw. In dental oncology there are some studies that show a high rate of local tumour recurrence in cases of irradiated lesions. However, a more difficult issue is the patient's wellbeing, as irradiation of the mandible can lead to sequels such as fibrosis, nerve damage and, at the least, morphological changes in the teeth. On the other hand, pre-treatment irradiation of the mandible may prevent the development of tumour in the mandible. In the case of suspected malignancies of the mandible a biopsy should be performed in order to avoid unnecessary irradiation. Ideally, the treating surgeon and the radiotherapist should participate in the planning of the operation and the irradiation in order to achieve the optimum result for both the patient and the tumour. As the jaw remains radiosensitive during the whole lifetime, the possibility of a recurrence should be discussed with the patient before starting the therapy. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to achieve this aim in the current situation of limited knowledge of the consequences of different irradiation schemes. This article presents an overview of the classical treatment schemes for the region of the mandible, as well as a brief overview of the risks and possibilities of pre-treatment irradiation. case, Weiland's position is flatly inconsistent with his counsel's.
