Hi, dear players! Welcome to the next episode of our contest "How I did it" - The Game Sounds in a month! Still, this contest is not over, there are still 37 users left. Today we give you task No. 22 - After the column of images, we give you 4 comments from us and you have to add one more comment which is "karma, luck or design" and it means that... you can choose for yourself, what kind of voice do you want to give - it will be - either a comment to the game, a video, or a song. "Crazy Tune Contest" is a new game by Veca Scolari and has been hosted in the Android app store during the last weekend. "Crazy Tune Contest" is a game which you have to play with your friends and play with your different characters. There are challenges you have to choose as well as levels. In the end of the game we have prize giveaways and also a leader board of who is the best player. Are you a fun for the children`s piano player? Then you have the chance to win a carillon for your piano! In a non-competitive situation, children play music, discover the world and learn. Crazy Train is an addictive game where you have to avoid the train wheels of several cubes as they fly by in a rather aggressive way. You can get points for each different level. The game has a lot of levels and like in most of the games on the play store, you can unlock them with achievement points. Hello! Play Crazy Train game - the famous game on the play store that is 1.4 million downloads downloaded. The goal in this game is to be the first to complete all the game levels as well as to avoid being run over by the train wheels. You can earn achievements, and the more you play, the better you become at it. Anxiety(?) Playa is another game on the Android market by the team that made Crazy Train. This game is great for those who like classic games. However, this time, it is completely free, there are no ads, or your participation is

, and in the field Before delving into my thoughts about film, I want to take a moment to talk about something I find frustrating about many reviews, especially those about science fiction films: When I'm reading reviews, I usually assume that the reviewer wouldn't mind if I ignored almost all of their article. I suppose that's a natural impulse, especially since the reviewer is probably writing either a very short review, or a very long one. But it's also a very selfish one. It assumes that what's at the heart of the review is more important than the author's experience, and there's no use forcing the author to write about something they don't really care about, unless they'd like to put a warning on their page: "This review contains very little about the actual movie, and is mostly about the movie-goer's thoughts while watching the movie!" But let's be rational here. Reviewers don't write these articles for a paycheck. They write these articles not for the money, but for the connection they feel with their audience, because their readers want to get to know them, and this is the only way to achieve that. In the case of genre blogs, the category might simply be "reviews" - they're written to share the reviewer's thoughts with other genre fans, which is a worthwhile thing to do, and also makes the author's opinions more interesting than they might be if they were simply sharing their opinions about a film they've seen. When we critique reviews and ask ourselves whether we'd like someone to write an article like that about a film we've seen, that's a way of deciding whether or not we think an article is worth reading. It doesn't assume, as many reviews often do, that the reviewer isn't willing to work at writing a great review. Is the writer of a short article who has grown tired of writing about something they'd like to learn more about! Are they not going to volunteer to spend time writing a great article when they're faced with the choice of spending 2 hours writing about something nobody cares about, or spending 2 hours catching up on some movie they haven't seen in 20 years, that they'd like to see once. I don'
