I feel that way watching the recent spate of articles on France about the future of the euro. Let me state the obvious: the euro has a long way to go before its fundamental problems are resolved. Despite political promises to the contrary, there is no sign that the countries that use the euro will ever agree on reforms that make the single currency a reality. For all the handwringing about Europe's leaders not having the courage to stand up to the Germans, it seems that most of the serious European leaders either don't understand the problem or don't think it is serious enough to merit a fundamental re-think of the European project.
