Medical science has attained a high degree of skill and a high level of success in the treatment of prostate cancer by surgical resection of the prostatic tissue. Several other treatments, including radiation therapy, chemotherapy, cryotherapy, and interstitial laser thermotherapy, have been proposed for selected patients as an alternative to surgery. In general, none of these treatments are capable of providing a complete and permanent cure since the cancer cells may spread to other locations in the body. It has also been observed that some patients undergo undesired side effects from the treatment, such as impotence or urinary incontinence. Local hyperthermia of prostatic tissue has been proposed as an alternative treatment, utilizing heat produced by the radio frequency energy output of radio frequency (RF) antennas. For example, by utilizing electromagnetic field energy in the 10.550-24.100 MHz range (specifically 18 to 20 MHz), an RF antenna can be attached to a urethral catheter or the like and energy applied by placing a current, such as 5 mA, through the coil of the antenna and generating a localized c6a93da74d
