What's new:

Stephen McGarnaun is the contributing editor of the Travel Reporter, a news and features department at Virgin Atlantic (a Virgin subsidiary). In this role, Stephen reports on what makes travel newsworthy and shares his insider knowledge of destinations and airlines in this monthly column. Last February, I reported on flights to the US only being available through US providers due to the terrorist attacks in the country. Despite warning, it still shocked many to read that the US carriers, the largest of which is American Airlines, were more than happy to provide this service. Since then, many questions have been raised about this emergency measure and I have been invited to speak at the World Travel Market (WTM) for the inaugural World Advanced Passenger Service Conference (WAPS). Part of my speech examines the US consumer's perception of this move. In this article, I explore what the move says about the Atlantic region, US consumer perceptions and the US economy. Back to the Talk... So, what are the questions being raised, and what do they mean? One of the more profound questions is: why did they do it? I'm told by people that unless you live in a remote town on the border or on the redneck side of nowhere, the New Jersey Turnpike has been no secret to you - it is likely to you have travelled on it before. Yet, despite this, the news was greeted with shock and criticism that it was any sort of witting action. Another question is whether the Emergency Aviation Act of 2001 (EAA), which supposedly allows the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA) to suspend all non-US airlines in the US, had been considered. While there are calls for the CAA to reveal how they would implement such a measure. However, for US carriers (and as demonstrated by Bill O'Leary's photographs) this has been a reality for some time. Nevertheless, when asked about US airlines' American preferences, and ensuring US services are available, they were not forthcoming, and at least one board member stated: "Why would we not want to fly a US carrier to a US destination!" I can imagine one of the reasons they weren't willing to reveal a plan is to avoid bad press before their 2011 event, although the carrier was willing to volunteer the views of those who were. The US economy is in a very rocky place. The magnitude of job losses is enormous. The reverberations can be felt in Europe, where many carriers
