Â .The role of Ca²⁺-activated adenosine triphosphatase (Ca-ATPase) in the calcium-induced insulin secretion in the rat pancreas. The role of Ca(2+)-dependent ATPase (Ca-ATPase) in the exocytotic event of the calcium-induced insulin secretion was investigated in the rat pancreas using both the stationary and perforated-patch methods. First, the single-cell motility was measured in either the presence or absence of calcium. The exocytotic cell was identified as a cell in which the stationary and perforated-patch currents were simultaneously measured.

Calcium with a micromolar concentration was found to induce the exocytosis of a single cell, but in the presence of the inhibitor of the Ca-ATPase, vanadate (2.5 mM), the event was not observed. In another experiment, the following substances were used to induce the exocytosis: caffeine (10 mM), cytosol of a cell (1:100), ATP (100 microM), and the inhibitor of the ATPase, N-
