

Hacking a computer system for the purpose of victimization a client is a offense and may possibly get you sanctioned by way of the law. This implies that a criminal offender who compromises a very important network computer code can possibly be charged with data violation or varied regulations. According to law, the sentence imposed is associated to the consequence of the offense. For example, if the client is defenseless and not aware that he/she is affected by the criminal activity, the criminal could be given an identical or lower sentence than if the client was knowledgeable. However, if the offense is more serious, the criminal offender may be charged with more severity charges. New Terrorist Threats - Secret Alerts From the Department of Homeland Security to All Americans (DOC) - 18.10.2013 - September 18, 2013 Terrorists have continued to develop their methods to carry out attacks against the United States as an expression of their disagreement with us and our Western values and way of life. Terrorists have learned how to exploit a wide array of technologies in order to facilitate the planning, preparation, and execution of their attacks. Terrorists exploit technology in a variety of ways. For example, they may use technology to assist in acquiring the skills and information necessary for carrying out the attack; to facilitate the identification of victims, the acquisition of weapons and materials, and the coordination of attacks; or to acquire the information they need to develop and refine their methodologies for causing mass casualties. New threats are being detected all the time. Here are some of the more recent ones: When the attack occurred in the middle of the night near the scene of an accident in Northern California, no one knew the intent of the attackers. Later, officials determined that the terrorists were planning to use this collision to attack a train station. A "sleeping cell" of attackers were living in a bus depot in Boston. Their digital devices were running 24/7. They were monitoring police radio conversations and determining where to move next. The "Holy Land" attack was the deadliest in Israel's history. An attack perpetrated by terrorists in Palestine that killed at least 13 people is still under investigation by the government. The "Bali bomb plot" in November 2002, and a separate "London blast plot" in November 2006, both involved Nigerian imams who were planning terrorist attacks on U.S. soil. Fortunately, the plots were uncovered by law enforcement and no attacks occurred. The 2002
