It is an American television series that was initially produced to follow the Saturday-morning animation series Super Sentai in Japan, which themselves are based on the original Mighty Morphin Power Rangers. The first season comprised five self-contained episodes, which were broadcast on Fox Kids beginning February 7, 1993. Saban Entertainment began planning the next season for its own network, Kids' WB. In 1997, the Green Ranger was formed, which comprised three seasons that were broadcast on the Disney Channel. Since 1998, Power Rangers has run its course on television in various countries. The franchise has also generated several films, in addition to video games, toys, soundtrack albums, plush toys, comic books, and pop culture merchandise. Though the Power Rangers began its life in a worldwide toy market, many children in Latin America, Europe, and Japan watch the show in their native language. All of the incarnations of Power Rangers have featured children who can transform into superheroes to fight villains and protect the earth. Each ranger wears a specific color of a weapon, and as a group, the Power Rangers are divided into "Ranger Teams," each consisting of three rangers and led by a "Ranger Master" (or "Ranger Mentor"). and the well-being of migrant children ABSTRACT This article considers the growing gap between the health and well-being of migrant children and their non-migrant peers. Poor children are disproportionately affected by the global health, economic and environmental crises. The benefits of social and educational capital that are associated with being part of a family are undermined by family structure, child food insecurity, education loss, and poverty. Children who experience immigration are two to three times more likely to grow up in poverty. Migrant children suffer from poverty and the strain of immigration and do not qualify for programs designed to improve their educational achievement, health and other services. The lack of effective medical attention that children in health crisis face, and the poor access to health care that researchers have documented for immigrant families, exacerbate the problems. While some of these issues affect all families, migrant families are particularly vulnerable to these difficulties and are often affected by these factors more than non-migrant families. Despite the recent changes in U.S. immigration policy, proposals to reform the U.S. immigration system in order to improve the health and well-being of migrant children, we suggest a change in policy that would focus on improving childrens' school environment. INTRODUCTION Census 2000 data indicate that one of every five children in the United States lives in a household where at least one parent is an immigrant (Chen & Hanson, 1998). Between 1980 and 2000 the number of children with at least one foreign-born parent increased by nearly 50%, from 32.5 million to 53.2 million (Khan et al., 2005). Children in immigrant families experience many obstacles that reduce their chances of reaching their full potential and completing a high school education. Amongst non-migrant families, three children out of every four graduate high school. Among immigrant families this level of educational attainment declines to one child out of every three. Three earlier estimates of the number of children and youth (1) who are in poverty2, (2) who are headed into the juvenile justice system3 (and have done so since the mid-1990s) and (3) who are in foster care (Cunningham, 2004, 2006) indicate that there has been little improvement in the outcome of children in immigrant families in recent years. BRAVEABILITY Most children enter school with high motivations and aspirations. However, cross-cultural differences in self-concept theory suggest that immigrant children are on a different developmental trajectory than their non
