Microsoft Silverlight, as one of the most important browsers for e-business solutions development in the enterprise environment. Business applications development packages are no longer limited to using the desktop, but you can also use a full network solution that runs on a number of client devices It is often the case that there is a lot of confusion surrounding quotes in eBusiness. So much so that an eBusiness tool provider has even come out with a slide deck titled Why you should avoid quotes in eBusiness (and I can't help but think the original title was a little confusing). Without having the pleasure of watching the presentation, we can all appreciate how clever it sounds to include a little tidbit in a Sales quote or an order : The end quote is included Well, did you ever wonder why this is? In a recent article written by James Hague, he answers this very question. The important takeaway that he makes is that sometimes you want to include a specific number in the sentence that follows it, and you don't always want the end quote to be part of that number. For example, you may want to display a price or a discount with a number like this Cost $20,000 As it stands, you'd have to quote it as the number $20,000 in front of the quote, Cost $20,000 ... and obviously this isn't desirable because the person receiving the email has to go and format the email properly to remove the dollar signs. Alternatively you could quote it in this way: The value is $20,000 And now, the price would appear as a total without any formatting on the recipient's part. The nice thing about quoting a variable is that it can be translated into whatever needs to be shown on the client side by the browser itself. For example, while the browser won't be able to display an e-mail to a client formatted like this, it will happily present the value : The value is $20,000 Below is a more advanced use of quoting variables, combining them with text strings. Or maybe there's something else that you want to quote. There are many different ways to accomplish this. But in general, it's often best to save those question marks, because it's often a sign that you probably need to do some analysis first. As we all know, people are notorious for turning the volume knob to 11, and I'm not going to 09e8f5149f

Favorite Schools Favorite Teams Bill Cosby, after a 30-year-run on the stand, gives another trial run Thursday in a case that could convict him of drugging and sexually assaulting Andrea Constand at his suburban Philadelphia home in 2004. He could face decades in prison if convicted. (AP Photo/HBO) BYron Wells on May 4, 2014 PHILADELPHIA — Andrea Constand, the former Temple University employee whose 2004 sexual assault trial was surrounded by a tabloid frenzy, says she still has doubts about whether Bill Cosby will testify again, this time at a criminal trial in which he's accused of drugging and sexually assaulting her. "There is a thin line between protecting your rights and invading someone's rights," Constand told the Associated Press on Thursday. "I just don't know if it was a good idea." The two-time Oscar winner, 78, has offered no public explanation for not testifying at his first trial earlier this year. Constand was the only witness for the defense, and he and his lawyers presented few details about the alleged assault, which took place at Cosby's suburban Philadelphia home. Cosby is free on $1 million bail. While Constand says she believes Cosby should have done more to help her, she said she understands why he decided not to take the stand. "You have to look at all the facts, and he's innocent until proven guilty," she said. "He probably wanted to just move forward. I get that. That's his right." Constand's lawyer, Dolores Troiani, has said in a statement that she doubts Cosby's
