Some of these data comes from an external source, but some is not and I need to convert to utf8 (I'm not converting non-English data to utf8). When I store a text field I'm storing it in utf8 as you can see from my codification in the image below: But when I look at the source of the site I'm getting the following: Not a lot of difference, but there is a missing left-to-right arrow at the beginning of the cell. Do you know how to convert the "Ñº àáäâãåãôöóôúùûü" string to utf8? A: See the UTF-8 BOM header RFC-2231 defines a minimal BOM (Byte-order Mark) format for UTF-8. By adding a BOM to a UTF-8 encoded text, you are clearly telling the reader the encoding. On the server side there are two ways to handle UTF8 data. One is UTF8 everywhere. This is easy to implement, but has some drawbacks. For example, when sending data to other servers, you can only rely on the server to send the data using UTF8. The other way is to use native(?) encoding and when you're ready to send the data, convert to UTF8. With the second solution you'll get

She has a bachelor's degree in meteorology from the University of Maine, and a master's degree in meteorology from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In addition to weather forecasting, she helps manage the company's computer-based weather models, and keeps track of all the technical details regarding the company's computer network. Before joining the editorial staff of the Sunrise Times in January 1994, she managed the weather forecasting division of a national chain of television weather broadcasters. She lives in South Portland and has three grown children, Sarah, Christine, and Matthew, and grandchild, Alexander. Christine Stiebel is the meteorologist for the Sunrise Times. From the desk of the chief meteorologist This is a tale of two cities. One is a booming business center with the highest quality of life in Maine. The other is still struggling to come to terms with the departure of its great newspaper. Before Sunrise Times publisher and owner John Marotta describes the city in the following terms: "Portland is a busy, fun, and enterprising place. A city of walkers, bikers, and concert goers." But what strikes me most is the downtown Portland of the 1970s that grows ever more distant, today. Before Sunrise Times publisher and owner John Marotta. 82138339de
