Pattern formation in a coupled convective-diffusion system with nonlinear relaxation. A class of partially linear models for developing thermal convection, coupled to a diffusion process which is nonlinear in the chemical potential, is derived by taking a low-speed limit of a nonlinear relaxation model of the present system. This class of models includes a convective-diffusion system with an exponentially bounded eddy diffusivity coefficient (exponential nonlinear convective system), in addition to a convective-diffusive system with a power-law bounded eddy diffusivity coefficient (power-law nonlinear convective system). In this paper, a global stability analysis of solutions in one spatial dimension is carried out to determine the ability of these systems to generate patterns and to relate these results to those of a low-speed version of the classical Chick-Watts model for pattern formation on a turbulent soap film. We have found that in the class of systems considered here, even when the system is linearly stable, it can still generate patterns in one dimension due to a nonlinear mechanism. The ability of these models to generate structures is illustrated by numerical simulations of various initial conditions and the ability of the models to collapse for certain initial conditions is examined.
