Scotland's public transport authority has committed to using driverless trains on five routes starting next year. Transport Scotland said it will spend £750,000 on a five-year programme to bring driverless test trains from London to Edinburgh in the next 12 months. The current driverless technology uses a software system to navigate a route, avoiding potentially dangerous situations like curve radius. The agency said the test trains will add choice and improve safety on the existing £1bn ScotRail franchise from Aberdeen to Edinburgh, as well as from Glenrothes to Edinburgh, Glasgow to Kilmarnock, Glasgow Central to Dunoon, and from Edinburgh airport to Glasgow Queen Street. It said a driverless service in the Kelvin valley has been running since October last year, and passengers have been able to watch the progress of the trial from the comfort of their seats. The agency has confirmed it has signed a deal with Northern Ireland Railways, which has nine tracks in the north-west of England. It said the deal will allow it to trial the technology in its service between Liverpool and Glasgow, where passengers will be able to experience the safe and cost-effective travel experience of a driverless service. Simon Gandy, ScotRail's head of new trains, said: "ScotRail is working with its infrastructure partners to improve services and improve customer journeys. "Our six driverless trains are an exciting development and can be an important driver in providing more frequent, frequent and faster trains and services." The Edinburgh to Glasgow rail line will be the first to be fully driverless in Scotland, with work to be done on the route in the next couple of years. Scottish transport minister Humza Yousaf said: "Driverless trains are the future of Scotland's railway, and they could provide an exciting way of transporting passengers into the future. "Transport Scotland's investment today is about building a safe and reliable railway service, including in the most remote parts of Scotland, and we will continue to invest in the coming years, ensuring services are the best they can be for customers." In July the Scottish government backed a bid for the operators of the southern rail franchise to use driverless trains, despite safety concerns.
