This application relates generally to cooperative driver assistance systems and methods for cooperative driver assistance systems, and more particularly to cooperative driver assistance systems and methods for cooperative driver assistance systems based on cooperative driver control systems. During an emergency, vehicles are often stopped or are moving very slowly. The occupants of the vehicle are at risk of being hit by other vehicles or by other objects, which may cause personal injury or property damage, or both. In such situations, an autonomous driver in a vehicle may be assigned as a driver assistance system that is capable of assisting the driver of the vehicle. The driver assistance system may include one or more radar systems to detect other vehicles, one or more cameras to detect other objects in the vicinity of the vehicle, and one or more computer systems that combine the received information to detect and to assist the driver. Such driver assistance systems may recognize when the vehicle is stopped, and may take action to warn the driver or to stop the vehicle based on the detected condition. In some instances, the driver assistance system may be in a vehicle, and may detect certain conditions of the vehicle environment, such as a lack of lane markings. However, the operator in the driver assistance system is still in charge of the control of the vehicle, and the driver assistance system is not able to assist the driver in the control of the vehicle unless the driver assistance system obtains the driver's acknowledgment of the driver assistance system and the driver provides his or her control input. The driver assistance system may therefore be considered to be a remote-controlled or automated vehicle, as the driver is still responsible for driving the vehicle. Moreover, the driver assistance system may be aware of certain vehicle control systems, and may be able to affect certain functions of such systems in response to certain events. However, the driver assistance system may be unaware of the operation of the various control systems in the vehicle, which may make it difficult to affect certain functions of the control systems based on events that the driver assistance system is aware of. Accordingly, it would be advantageous to provide a driver assistance system and method that overcomes one or more of the drawbacks identified above. William Elsdon (police officer) William Elsdon (1836 – 4 May 1899) was an English police officer known for his service with the Metropolitan Police and later the City of London Police. After serving for some years as a railway porter, Elsdon joined the Metropolitan Police as a constable in 1862, quickly becoming a detective sergeant in the Clerkenwell Division. Promoted to the rank of sergeant by 1872, he was transferred to the City of London Police, where he worked under Sir John Anderson. Elsdon is best known for his role in the case of the Whitechapel Murders, in which the murders of the 10 victims and the burial of the 11th were the work of Jack the Ripper. He arrested a suspect in 1888, but made no definite charge of murder at the time. Subsequently, the suspect was charged with more than a dozen murders, including that of Elsdon's wife, Ellen, who had been killed in an accidental shooting. During the course of an investigation of the Ripper crimes in 1888, Elsdon developed the theory that the murdered women were prostitutes who were killed while visiting brothels. He also proposed a detailed scheme for identifying the killer, which formed the basis for a novel by Dr. George Moore. Elsdon's ideas formed the basis for several subsequent books on Jack the Ripper, including Ann Farrer-Harrison's I, Jack the Ripper, and Dr. John Bodkin Adams' Jack the Ripper Unmasked. Elsdon retired in 1897, and died later that year. Early life Elsdon was born in Batley, West Riding of Yorkshire, England. The family name was originally "Eldred", but had been changed by his third cousin, the vicar of Kirkham, to "Elsdon" in 1844. According to his obituary in The Times, he had a "younger brother named John and two sisters, Emma and Ellen." Elsdon worked in his late teens for a railway company in Leeds, before moving to London to work as a railway porter in the mid-1860s. He joined the Metropolitan Police as a constable in 1862, serving initially with the 1st Division of the Metropolitan Police. Police career Elsdon's career in the Metropolitan Police was short and unremarkable. Before joining, he made a single arrest – that of a burglar in a barn
