FDA Just Proposed A Ban On Energy Drinks, Where Do We Go From Here? Enlarge this image toggle caption iStockphoto.com iStockphoto.com Updated at 9:47 p.m. ET It was a head-shaking move, in effect banning caffeine-infused beverages, all based on a single study conducted in a lab. The Food and Drug Administration announced last week it would outlaw energy drinks in a public comment period, warning that they might be "detrimental to health" because they contain excessive amounts of caffeine, sugar, and other stimulants. At issue is one study conducted at Cincinnati Children's Hospital Medical Center. The authors analyzed postmortem brain samples from 12 children who had died suddenly. They found caffeine levels were "greater than 5 times" the amounts seen in normal tissues. The children had a median blood caffeine level of 27.9 milligrams per liter, versus 9.2 milligrams per liter in adults who drink less than three cups of coffee per day. The study is published online in the journal JAMA Pediatrics and will soon be published in the print edition. In a statement, Cincinnati Children's says it is "completely confident" in the study's findings. But the makers of the drinks, according to an FDA-commissioned research study, have produced other evidence. These companies also call the study an outlier. And while that study was cited in the FDA's draft proposal, some academic medical scientists consider it irrelevant to the pending rule. James Todd, a neuroscientist at the University of Missouri School of Medicine and editor of a supplement of JAMA Pediatrics that appeared on the heels of the paper, says the children's samples were drawn more than 40 years ago. "There are a lot of other studies out there that indicate caffeine doesn't go anywhere near your brain," Todd says. Caffeine is contained in more than 300 brands of energy drinks, including Gatorade. It is a weight loss supplement and sports drink. There is also considerable disagreement on how much caffeine gets to the brain and what effects it has, Todd says. "The question of whether caffeine is safe is probably not the question we need to ask ourselves," says Todd. "It may be the question we need to answer — but we don't have enough evidence." FDA spokesman Eric Pahon says the agency is basing its rules on the "science, not the
