Category:Red Alert (series)The present invention is directed to a device for aligning (i.e., axially centralizing) a plurality of bone screws of a spinal implant device. The invention may be used with any spinal implant including, for example, solid rod-type, plate-type, and link-type implants. In the typical spinal implant system, connecting members, such as bone screws, are implanted into the pedicle and/or lamina of a vertebrae and are coupled to another portion of the spinal implant device. The coupling members allow adjacent vertebral bodies to be laterally offset relative to each other, while still providing support and stability to the spine. In order to provide proper alignment, the screw heads must be properly aligned and centered on the rod. In addition, for the head of the screw to be perfectly centered on the rod, the rod itself must be precisely located within the patient's spine. Therefore, the portion of the spinal implant system to which the rod must be attached typically includes a mechanism to guide and center the rod. Various techniques and devices have been developed in order to achieve proper alignment of the screw heads during a spinal implantation procedure. For example, a jig may be used to allow the surgeon to pre-drill a hole into which the screw will be inserted during the spinal implant procedure. Once the hole has been drilled, the jig may be used to support and center the rod on the screw prior to insertion of the rod into the hole. However, the jigs are typically cumbersome to use and restrict the surgeon's freedom of movement during the surgical procedure. In another example, some rod guidance systems utilize a drill that is mechanically coupled to a rod seat. The rod seat engages the rod and has a channel to accept the drill. When a drill is used to drill the screw hole, the drill bit is pulled forward by the rod seat, thereby guiding the drill along a desired path. While this procedure allows the surgeon to pre-drill the location of the screw hole, the drill must
