Purslane (Medicago lupulina) has emerged as a potential model for the study of plant lipid metabolism due to its production of both structurally unique isoprenoid phytosterols and oxygenated fatty acids, including a potent anti-cancer fatty acid, falcarinol. Intriguingly, novel components such as a class of trypsin-resistant proteins and novel fatty acid signals have also been identified in the leaves of this crop plant. In this review, the application of purslane and its associated metabolites to a range of biological questions that are relevant to human health is discussed. Collectively, the findings highlight the potential of purslane to serve as a model crop plant in further advancing our understanding of lipid metabolism and the roles that plant lipid metabolites may play in human nutrition and health..
