What's new:

: A Pilot's Life "FINCH, FUEL, FIRE! FUEL! FIRE! I'M IN SHOCK! FIRE!" Fire began to pour out from behind me: within only twelve heartbeats (counted in terms of the passage of time, not the duration of a career), three of my crew had died, another was unconscious, and a fourth was yelling for help. God only knows what happened before then. We landed [named a ground crew] after we'd tried firing up the engines multiple times. There was a lot of confusion, and for reasons that are beyond me now, I don't really care to dwell on, we became very quickly convinced that we'd screwed something up on a level so far beyond our ability to repair, that to make it worse, that we'd attacked U.S. territory during the U.N. embargo. The survivors did what any living creature would do when faced with their pain: we tried to blot it out by getting high. As soon as I looked at the fuel gauge, I knew the situation was dire, and my crew, which I'd carefully selected out of a variety of applicants, hadn't been weaned off the single drug for their training program. We smoked two to three blunts before we realized what we'd done, jumped out of the cockpit, and floated. After we fell out of the aircraft, I smoked some more and tried to vomit. It didn't come. I looked at the fuel gauge, again realizing that I was about to die. Surely, by this point, at least one of my crew should have been able to rationally come to terms with the inevitable. It took a while, but they did. When the fuel in my tail was gone, I thought I knew what I was going to do. It was going to be a long, slow fall. We had, I'm embarrassed to say, a bit of junked tech lying around: one of our primary bus bars had become dislodged. I repurposed it to act as a ballistic missile weapon. As pieces of the wing began to break off, the missile body went spinning down into the open air. I was, I have to admit, quite proud of the aerodynamics. Something whapped me in the side of the head. My mechanical-mind instinct told me it was a piece of white-painted metal.
