713-853-3062 Relevance of local and intraperitoneal chemotherapy in treatment of recurrent ovarian cancer. A randomised prospective study of 100 cases. In 100 consecutive ovarian carcinoma patients, who were treated with a curative intent for primary disease, a successful peritoneal scintigraphy (PS) was done routinely prior to second-look surgery. During the latter, following PS, the patients were randomised into two groups; one of 20 patients received intraperitoneal (i.p.) and the other of 80 patients local chemotherapy (peritoneal injection plus intraabdominal continuous infusion of cisplatin). The treatment groups were comparable. Among the 20 patients of group I, PS (24%) was positive in eight (40%), while all of the 80 patients with negative PS (16%) had platinum-sensitive relapses. This difference was statistically significant. Patients of group I were treated with (i.p.) or without (local) chemotherapy. There was a statistically significant prolongation of the disease-free interval. The presence of disseminated intraabdominal disease did not influence the response to chemotherapy.
