From download links, we have collected most up-to-date versions of all CADmep, CAMduct, ESTmep and Inventor 2020 At the end of the 1980s, the simultaneous introduction of the M-Zet and M-Zeta ceramic multi-pin capacitors greatly widened the field of application of high-energy pulsed power capacitors. This development was made possible by a complete technical development involving a very high power density, a high maximum voltage per capacitor, a low capacitance deviation and a good dimensional stability. The high power density is obtained with a short switching time constant. The compactness of the components is obtained with a low leakage current and a high dielectric strength, which allows the components to have a useful life, even if the components are shorted and subject to sparks. High-energy, multi-pulse ceramic capacitors are components that can be used for example in short circuit switches for high-power pulsed systems. Moreover, ceramic multi-pulse multi-pin capacitors are also known. The application field of these components is high-power applications, particularly for the generation of high-energy electrical pulses. It is known to use ceramic multi-pulse ceramic multi-pin components as parts of pulsed systems. But these applications use the components in a final working state. The components used are used in final working state after an annealing process, or a sintering process. However, an intermediate working state is much more valuable for the functional tests of these components before they are used. For the aforementioned reasons, there is a need to provide a system for a reversible testing of a ceramic multi-pulse multi-pin component for the intermediate working state. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to an optical film and, more specifically, to an optical film having an improved dark state stability. 2. Discussion of the Related Art An optical film, such as a polarizing film, generally has a polarization effect. Thus, the optical film has been used for various optical components, such as a display device, and an optical information recording/reproducing apparatus. In such applications, the optical film needs to have an appropriate dark
