The new mayors of Fukuoka and Osaka are due to fly to New York today as the two cities seek to forge closer ties by forming a political alliance with the Big Apple. "Both cities hope for a long-term alliance with the mayoralty in New York," says Nagahiro Ogawa of the newly elected mayor of Fukuoka, which is one of the cities under the tight grip of the pro-nuclear industry. The two mayors have vowed to tighten their cooperation through a "mega alliance," with the Fukuoka municipal government setting up a foundation with the New York City-based economic development office, and the two cities' police forces joining forces, among other measures. Ogawa, a longtime supporter of nuclear energy, has previously called for closer collaboration between the two cities on nuclear issues, and his election to the position last month was seen as a victory in that regard. "New York is the leading light of the global economy. It would be difficult to go up against it," says a spokesman for the mayor of Osaka. "There is no better means than joining hands with New York in these turbulent times." The world is still reeling from the 2011 nuclear disaster at Fukushima Daiichi, the second-worst nuclear accident after Chernobyl, with the power of the nuclear industry clearly on the wane. Just last year, local leaders in Fukuoka, including two mayors, quit the pro-nuclear lobby to oppose nuclear development. In an effort to appease those concerns, the Fukuoka municipal government has opened its doors to experts from the nuclear-free group Fissile Matters, some of whose members live in New York. In the wake of its Fukuoka disaster, New York is also actively promoting its own non-nuclear alternative energy policies, offering up lessons learned in the aftermath of the 2011 disaster. The two cities will also explore the use of the Olympic Games to build up their respective economies. New York and other large cities in the United States are beginning to see the potential of the Games, and Tokyo and Osaka are looking to capitalise on the event by using 09e8f5149f

Developing a Better Prescription First thing first, we need to understand the difference between the two words in play: prescription and drug. A prescription is a specific treatment plan or treatment program. Many doctors will write a prescription for a person and many people will take a prescription to a pharmacy and fill that prescription. A prescription is the medicine needed by a patient. Many people get themselves started on a new regime by simply adjusting their daily lifestyle and eating habits. But some people have a condition that will only be treated by medication or other drugs, while others are too far into the disease process to simply make lifestyle changes. Triggers and Cues When a person goes to a doctor for medication, we say that the doctor has written a prescription for the patient. The doctor is actually prescribing medication and the patient has a prescription for that medication. The same concept applies to consumers who go to a pharmacy to purchase a prescription. But, there are certain situations where the consumer must act first in order to obtain a prescription. A person who is pregnant, for example, must be given a prescription because a doctor has determined that the medication prescribed for the mother will help protect the baby. The doctor can write a prescription, but this is not sufficient. The consumer (mother) must have a prescription before she can buy it.
