Background: We have a perforce instance for our code, and as part of our deployment process we have a git-svn repository. That works fine, as long as no one logs into perforce to edit the repository, as they'll be editing with the git-svn svn://... URL.

Problem: The problem is that our git-svn processes make changes to the perforce files, but I have no clue how to configure git-svn to accept per-user access, so that it doesn't push every change to the svn repo, overwriting our perforce changes, and instead keeps our perforce instance as the authoritative version of the files.

Solutions? A: The git svn wrapper will commit to your perforce repository as well as the svn repository. It will use perforce as the author of the commit. As long as you don't have a perforce update in between. If you are relying on perforce to synchronize the repository from every commit, you will need to change the workflows of you git clients.
