Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a window assembly and, more specifically, to a window assembly with unique methods of use to adapt windows to various sizes of a product. 2. Description of the Prior Art Window assemblies are typically employed to provide a barrier between a user and a media environment. Window assemblies can also be employed to offer some protection from the environment. A typical window assembly includes a glass pane or window to provide a visual barrier between the user and the media environment and a frame to provide structural support for the glass pane. During manufacturing, window assemblies are typically manufactured in predetermined widths. After the window assemblies are formed, a customer, often a manufacturer of products, can then purchase the window assemblies. To this end, the customer may be required to maintain or store a large number of differently sized window assemblies in a warehouse. Requiring customers to maintain a large number of differently sized window assemblies can be an inefficient use of storage space. The present invention overcomes these and other disadvantages of the prior art by providing a means for adapting a prefabricated window assembly to various sizes of a product. GPCR-associated sorting in lysosomes is coordinated with receptor-mediated pathway activation. The endocytic degradation of G protein-coupled receptors (GPCRs) regulates the timing and magnitude of signal transduction. We have analyzed sorting of the cationic amino acid receptor 1 (CAT1) and the muscarinic acetylcholine receptor 1 (CHRM1) in endosomes and lysosomes. Both receptors were found to localize predominantly to early endosomes. Their turnover, however, was markedly distinct. Whereas CAT1 transiently localized to the recycling endosomes, the CHRM1 was maintained in early and late endosomes. The pulse-chase experiments showed that upon endocytosis of CHRM1, it is rapidly delivered to the plasma membrane, whereas a delay of at least 5 h occurs in delivering CAT1 from its early endosomal compartment to the plasma membrane. Lysosomal trafficking of both receptors was also investigated by pulse-chase experiments in HeLa cells. Once internalized, CHRM1 was rapidly delivered
