The next time you get into a side scuffle with a drunken stranger, think of this: on March 21, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration will make it easier for airlines to start enforcing their policies that make passengers pay more for lost or damaged bags. The policy, which bans an airline from charging for lost or damaged bags weighing more than 10 pounds, won't affect the airlines the way it will affect consumers. It won't necessarily make flying more expensive or limit travelers' bag options; it will just make the airlines be consistent. But the policy's companion regulation, which bans airlines from charging for overweight bags, could have a broader impact. "It's difficult to see how the airlines aren't going to raise prices because of this," says New York University's Edward Snyder, a transportation economist. "If you can't charge more for something that's a financial liability, then you're stuck with no place to put the money.” Even when airlines keep their pre-Crisis baggage pricing, Americans don’t say they’re pleased. According to a 2012 survey from market research company OnePoll, American and Delta Airlines were in the top three airlines to people as not being affordable—meaning they cost too much. And now, it’s getting harder for the airlines to keep their bag prices low c6a93da74d
