To investigate the uptake of and response to tributyltin (TBT) in Blattella germanica (L.), neonatal and first instar (feeding) larvae were exposed to environmentally relevant concentrations of TBT using flow-through chambers. TBT uptake was monitored following in vivo [14C]TBT application at different time points. Metabolism of [14C]TBT was also investigated. Larvae of both developmental stages showed the capability of taking up the compound, with a high uptake rate in neonatal B. germanica. Both high levels of activity in the gut and esophageal glands and higher uptake rates of TBT were observed in neonatal than in feeding larvae. Physiological metabolism of TBT was observed by in vitro addition of [14C]TBT to antennal glands and revealed the presence of membrane enzymes with the ability to degrade TBT. The enzymatic activity was higher in gut fluid from neonatal than in that from feeding larvae. TBT uptake into and metabolism in B. germanica larvae might depend on age. Due to the important role of environmental exposure on TBT accumulation and toxicity in invertebrates, further studies on exposure levels and transfer factors from the environment are needed. The burden of asthma-associated emergency department visits in the United States: implications for primary care. Most asthma-associated emergency department (ED) visits are preventable; primary care physicians' rates of compliance with guidelines recommending inhaled corticosteroids and peak flow monitoring for control of asthma are suboptimal. The primary objective of this study was to describe asthma-associated ED visit rates across age groups and payer sources. A prospective, observational study was performed at the University of Chicago Medical Center. Consecutive asthma-associated ED visits were
