There has been a substantial increase in interest in the effects of facial expression recognition on children's ability to assess information from facial cues. Most studies to date have used a vignette or a questionnaire to measure children's tendency toward positive academic bias, and have suggested that facial expression recognition plays a role in learning and making decisions. Thus, the current study aimed to investigate the relationship between children's ability to detect and interpret facial cues in the classroom and children's tendency toward positive academic bias as well as to examine the role of facial expression recognition in children's tendency toward positive academic bias. The data indicated that children who had higher facial expression recognition ability showed greater positive academic bias toward information associated with positive facial expressions than those with lower facial expression recognition ability, which was dependent on the size of the facial expression. In addition, children who had higher facial expression recognition ability were more likely to predict that the target child would give a positive response to a question relating to positive facial expressions than those with lower facial expression recognition ability, but not in response to negative facial expressions. These results suggest that children's ability to interpret facial cues affects their tendency toward positive academic bias in the classroom.*}, [arXiv:1102.2919 [hep-th]]. T.
