High-performance primers applied to dental restorative materials should provide optimal adhesion and protection against oral environment challenges, including demineralization, dissolution, and hydrolysis. This study evaluated the effects of phosphoramidate bond formation on the polarity of resin monomers and the pH-dependent abrasion resistance of composite primers. Commercially available resin monomers containing phosphoramidate groups [pH 12.2] were compared with phosphoramidate-free resin monomers [pH 12.2] and commercial primers containing phosphoramidate groups [pH 4.3]. Contact angle measurements of polymer solutions showed that phosphoramidate resin monomers were more hydrophilic than phosphoramidate-free resin monomers [pH 12.2] and commercial primers [pH 4.3]. Abrasion resistance of the primer-coated specimen was evaluated by the ball-on-disc test. Initial relative velocities of the primer-coated discs were similar to that of the uncoated discs. However, after six 500-g rubbing, the primer-coated discs showed a significantly lower abrasion resistance. The result of acidity and a chelating agent test of saliva and artificial saliva, respectively, indicated that acidity was the primary
