It is our purpose to elucidate such properties which might account for the high degree of resistance to infection exhibited by the host cell. We will approach this problem by studying membrane domains and their relationship to lipid-protein interactions by systematic biochemical and biophysical analyses. Two systems will be employed which relate directly to specific membrane domains of the erythrocyte membrane. (1) The cholesterol-phospholipid phase separating liposomes will be used to study the inter-relationship between lateral phase separation and the physicochemical properties of liposomes. Special attention will be given to the factors which control the size and shape of the expanded domains found in these systems and the relationship of phase separation to protein motion and conformation. (2) The interaction of a single membrane active protein, glycophorin A, with the bilayer of the human erythrocyte will be investigated. First, the thermodynamics of these interactions will be studied to establish if the binding of one protein molecule can alter the thermodynamics of lipids in the bilayer. If this is found to be the case, then a thermodynamic analysis of the surface packing of two molecules will be made. This will reveal the extent of cooperativity of binding and the
