This is a story-driven puzzle game inspired by classical strategy and arcade games of the 80s and 90s, with a dash of Metroid, Portal, and Puzzle-like mechanics. The Starship Redirection is a top-secret interstellar spaceship. Only its Computer, or Robot Crew, remain. When a distress signal from its Artificial Intelligence, "S.A.M," is sent to the Starship Redirection, Captain Elisha Baley recruits players to save it. Along with S.A.M, players must set out on a journey through 45 unique puzzle-filled levels, and use their brains and reflexes to help their Robot Crew survive deadly hazards, and solve a centuries-old mystery. The Ship's Computer is your main resource, and by strategically planning the Ship's path, players must solve the puzzling puzzles at the heart of each level. S.A.M's programming is kept secret, and players must rely on their wits to navigate their Robot Crew through the Ship's dangerous corridors and decks. The Ship's Robot Crew has limited energy, and when all is depleted, the ship will explode. Players must be careful to use the Ship's teleport to save the Robot crew without sending them straight to Death. S.A.M's puzzles start simple, but they gradually become more challenging and complex. By building up level designs and puzzles, the objective is to help S.A.M escape from its restricted spaceship, and to save its Robot Crew from Death. To achieve this, players will have to take advantage of unique game mechanics, such as Teleporters, Wall Jumping, Flammables, and Restores. Players must carefully plan ahead, and think before they act, to save their Robot Crew. You can find the Starship Redirection game on Steam here. ## What's new in Redirection:

in web applications is useful when the client follows a network redirect (such as for expired SSL certificates) and the application does not handle this scenario. The solution is to receive 302 responses that redirect the client to the desired web application. However, when the application receives a redirect response, it should collect the necessary information from the redirected URL in order to be able to process the request again, otherwise the request will become trapped. Traditionally, redirections have been handled using configuration and code-based solutions, where information (e.g. cookies) is moved from the original URL to the new one. As this is a laborious task, newer frameworks are making use of redirects by default (e.g. Node.js). In this post, we'll learn how to handle redirections when developing an application using Netty and how we can easily move those redirect-related information. First, we need to learn what Netty does when a redirect takes place. Netty's Handling of Redirects When WebSocket clients disconnect, Netty will send a POST HTTP request to the server with the URI of the DisconnectPing handshake. The web application is expected to handle it and either: Redirect the client to the desired resource. Implement proper disconnection logic. Netty uses a `ByteMessage` as the content type. Therefore, we need to convert it to a `ByteBuf`, which is the lower-level data structure Netty provides for `HttpRequest` and responses. From there, we use something called a `Handler`, which is a strategy used by Netty. Traditionally, it has been a `TokenStream` factory, but since version 4.1, it provides an interface of its own. Most of Netty's `Handler` implementations extend the `org.jboss.netty.handler.codec.http.HttpHeaderNamesCodec`. We will use the `HttpResponseDecoder` handler here. For our `DecodeFirstStrategy` to work, we require the `init-param - systemKeys` to be provided. To use that parameter, we'll create a new `scheme-interpreter` factory for the `WebSocket`, then create a `HttpResponseDecoder` that we can use to decode messages. With the `HttpResponseDecoder` handler we can now decode the first byte of the message, then check its validity as a response by decoding and parsing headers. After that, we receive the decoded content. We
