Comparison of in-hospital and 30-day outcomes after elective stenting for non-ST-segment elevation acute coronary syndromes. There are limited data regarding the outcomes of patients who undergo elective stenting for non-ST-segment elevation acute coronary syndromes (NSTEMI-ACS). We compared in-hospital and 30-day outcomes in patients who underwent elective stenting for NSTEMI-ACS with those who underwent percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI) with drug-eluting stents (DES). From January 2010 to November 2013, 1,831 patients underwent elective PCI for stable angina, unstable angina, or silent ischemia. Of these, 245 (13.1%) underwent stenting for NSTEMI-ACS. Of these, 135 (54.5%) were women and the mean age was  $65.4 \pm 12.5$  years. After propensity score matching, 97 stented and 97 matched controls were compared. Patients were followed for 30-day outcomes and major adverse cardiac and cerebrovascular events (MACCE) including death, non-fatal myocardial infarction, stent thrombosis, and stroke. The two groups were similar with respect to baseline demographics. Stented patients had a higher incidence of diabetes (49.5% vs. 26.2%,  $p = 0.003$ ), Killip class  $\geq 2$  (55.3% vs. 28.9%,  $p$

To summarise the current state of information derived from systematic reviews and meta-analyses on the application of meta-analysis methods to economic evaluations. Traditional systematic reviews are carried out by searching and reviewing the literature to identify research, synthesising the data using standard techniques and taking into account the sensitivity of the evidence, for example due to methodological quality and publication bias. A recent trend is for reviews to include a formal component of systematic review and meta-analysis, producing statistical summaries of the data and, in the process, providing quantitative information on the effectiveness of interventions. Recent developments have led to the wider application of meta-analysis methodologies to studies of cost-effectiveness (CE). Recent meta-analyses in the cost-effectiveness (CE) literature include CE reviews of cost-effectiveness studies of interventions for obesity, systemic lupus erythematosus, ovarian carcinoma, osteoarthritis, multiple sclerosis and breast cancer. Methodological challenges associated with the use of meta-analysis in CE reviews include the heterogeneity of evidence, methodological quality and the presence of publication bias. Despite these challenges, the use of meta-analysis methods can lead to stronger conclusions, particularly in CE reviews."
