• Swfdec-mozilla is a Firefox extension that adds support for the freediving data format compressed by KMS Video Converter. It does the conversion and gives you the option to download them if you ask. The setup uses the Content Decoding Module (CDM) included in the OS to play back the content. Unfortunately, many WMV videos do not play back correctly because of the lack of the WMV9 codec. The conversion quality is quite good, especially if you have enough bandwidth. You can perform the KMS Video Converter DCM installation directly from your browser with the Swfdec-mozilla extension. This will download the necessary DLLs as soon as you start the extension. The extension can be quite useful for playing back recordings from freediving computers, because of the multitude of data formats included in it. It takes up quite a lot of memory so you have to close all other applications to avoid consuming system resources. When you are done, the extension makes available to you a list of downloadable files that include the converted files. You can choose the ones you like to download and open them directly from your browser. That way, you can save several minutes of downloading time. However, you can always convert a DCM file to other formats using a freeware program. The extension includes two more modules to convert to two other data formats: Ogg Vorbis and M4V. There is no support for raw/old format playbacks, yet. If you want to remove the extension, you have to follow the same instructions you did when installing it for the first time. Distribution P. orientalis was first described by El-Matbouli in 1934 from specimens found in Jericho. Later, the work was briefly published in the volume of the Bulletin de L'Institut Pasteur but the author was, in fact, the French entomologist M.R. Saulcy. It was first described by Anjarle and Nascimento in 1981 from specimens collected in the Mtshabaneng locality in Botswana. The type locality is Jericho, Palestine. Ecology and life cycle P. orientalis is a phlebotomine sandfly that usually bites rabbits, rodents, chickens, dogs, and humans. The main vector is Lutzomyia longipalpis. Phlebotomine sandflies have a two stage life cycle. First, they are aquatic and feed on the blood of leeches and frogs. The adult female engorges herself on a vertebrate host, including humans, and then deposits the eggs in a breeding site. The larval stage is aquatic and is divided into four stages: the first pupation stage takes place in the environment for seven to thirteen days. The second pupation stage is underwater for approximately one month. The third stage is the segmented stage, when the pupa undergoes metamorphosis into a pharate adult. Finally, a fourth stage of resting is required for the adult to emerge. The sandfly is sexually mature after three to four days and may live for six to seven days after feeding.
