How can a malicious program prevent the the system from doing it's job? When a program crashes or is stopped for any reason, it terminates and is removed. Therefore the program may not have enough privilige or time to do a whole lot of damage. However, it is very easy to have a program that periodically keeps running, as instructed by some sort of scheduler or a daemon. In this case the program can hack the scheduler or daemon to do it's work and keep running. So how to prevent such a program from hurting? There are many possible solutions: Reboot. Lock the CPU. Lock the memory. Define a contract for the scheduler or daemon that it must have the right to run some programs, and not others. I guess the solution is a combination of these. Are there any other solutions? Edit: Several of the solutions suggested here are applied to programs running on a single core, but the assumption is that a malicious program is on a multi-core machine. A: I think you are putting too much trust in the normal OS process lifecycle. Given a single-core system with no device drivers, memory areas, or hardware that you do not have full control over, you can never control every single bit and piece of memory in any way - that includes timing a malicious program and getting the OS to lock up. There are three main ways you could try to protect your system: Block the ability of a malicious program to run (as Dan has mentioned) Foil counterfeit wallets Restrict the ability of a malicious program to access certain data (as
