Two weeks ago, a transaction of 68 million coins took place on the Lightning Network (LN). This transaction was between two peers on LN. However, the network can be used for much more than simply moving coins from one person to another. In fact, a blockchain itself can be used to broadcast messages to a group of individuals. This is where the Lightning Torch Protocol comes in. More on Lightning and LN click here The Long Snorkel In the past, many merchants would keep their funds in one address on the blockchain. This allowed them to reduce the number of inputs to their online stores, requiring fewer confirmations for a change of ownership. However, it also let any person with access to their wallet, or the server in question, to move funds easily. As a result, it is much safer to store your funds in a wallet that is connected to a secure channel with the merchant. Fortunately, the Lightning Network and the upcoming Lightning Torch allow one to broadcast a network of channels between individuals and merchants. The use of a blockchain can then be completely removed from the process. This offers merchants protection from their customers, and transparency for the people who are sending the funds. Blockchain for Broadcasting The Lightning Torch Protocol is inspired by the Lightning Torch (RFC 5044). This protocol allows anyone to broadcast messages to a group of users on the Lightning Network. One of the best ways to think about this is the use of the Bitcoin blockchain for broadcasting. In short, the Lightning Torch is an extension of the concept of the Lightning Torch. This protocol is different from the Lightning Torch in that it uses the hardware platform of the Lightning Network. Lightning Torch Protocol Explained The concept behind the Lightning Torch is quite simple. To send a message, you must use a new channel (superchannel) in the Lightning Network. This is done using the Lightning Torch (LT). For each use of the LT, a child channel is setup. This child channel is used for
