TOSHIBO.JP: The best fantasy action RPG game out there. I have 60 hours into this and every one of those hours has been spent wisely. I love the sense of exploration and discovery. Especially the discovery of new races. So far I have found half-elves, humans, dwarves, orcs, goblins and ogres. Each with their unique look and feel. And their own set of skills. Though some of these races(Orc e.g.) are based off those in our world but others are not. Their race was fully formed from the beginning. All the races are unique in their own way. Another thing I love, is even though it looks like a hack'n'slash, there is no such thing here, try as I may, you can't get me. I like the fact that its hard but fair even on the first run. It's like 2d WoW. On the harder difficulties however, you will lose spells but that's it. All the life devouring trophies, things that look like a boss but are take turns that makes your patience change a DataGridView text value on update from another DataGridView I have 2 DataGridView's in my winforms and when I change value of the first dataGrid, what I am doing is changing the value in second DataGridView. I was asking a question on how to do this here have had some suggestions but found it was harder than when I first started. Let's say I have a DataTable and have added a few rows into a DataGridView with a specific column name being Category. I then change the value of a cell in another DataGridView named DataGridView2. I want the value of the "Category" cell for the row I have just changed the value in DataGridView2 to be used for the row in dataGridView1. I ask my question to get some direction on this and the answer given pointed me in this direction: When I put this into my code I only seemed to get half the functionality I wanted. Let me explain a bit more: On the DataGridView1, I have a list of the values in a Category column, these values have icons associated with them. For example, the icon will be a wrench when the value is A, a fork when the value is B and so on. When I set the value of a cell in DataGridView2 to either of these values, I don't want the icon to be shown at all. So when I change the value to the value not being shown, it is changed but not removed from the icons that are already there. Which is not what I want. Now, at the moment when I set the value to the value that is not being used I have to manually remove the icons from the cell before
