download content from a Web site and save it to your desktop, consider using the Web page downloader offered by File Transfer Free (Mac) or Gist Pro (Windows). First off, both applications offer the ability to download the entire Web page as a single file, a local copy of which can then be saved to your hard drive. Getting download URLs As both apps offer a free of charge demo version, which is fully functional, you might get stuck at the first hurdle: how to get the download URLs. If you want the program to generate a list of links from a website, you can use the online demo version. Otherwise, you have to come up with something on your own. As for Gist Pro, you can just go to the HTML version of the site you want to download and manually record the download URLs that are in the source code of the page. For File Transfer Free, a simple search for the string download in the URL line is what you need to do. Local access Both apps offer a unique set of tools to facilitate the download process. Starting with File Transfer Free, you can actually see an image preview of the downloaded document before you save it. For Gist Pro, the share menu lets you quickly and easily share your download (and/or local copies of any documents) via social networks, email, FTP or SFTP. Interestingly, File Transfer Free offers remote file access as well. To do so, just click the Download link and share the corresponding download URL via a tool such as Google or Facebook. File sizes There is no doubt that Gist Pro is the larger of the two programs and offers a number of interesting features. However, the user experience is not as smooth and intuitive as the one offered by File Transfer Free. If you have download a large number of files (especially, if you are on an old machine), then you might not be too thrilled by the program's user interface. Plus, there is a one-way only support in case of any issues. On the other hand, File Transfer Free offers a comparatively more straightforward and familiar interface. Extensibility
