IPAD 2 AUTODESK 2015 459011. Project Summary/Abstract Much effort has been directed at understanding the cellular and molecular mechanisms of opioid addiction. Both activation of mu-opioid receptors (MORs) and their down-regulation contribute to the rewarding aspects of opioid abuse. Long-term changes in gene expression induced by chronic opioid treatment have been described in various brain regions, including the amygdala, hippocampus, and nucleus accumbens. Among such changes, increases in MOR and its agonist-activated G-protein-coupled receptor kinase 2 (GRK2), a key regulator of MOR desensitization, have been identified in the amygdala, hippocampus, and nucleus accumbens in animal models of drug addiction. Up-regulation of GRK2 in these brain regions was also found in human heroin addicts. Moreover, in the nucleus accumbens, decreases in GRK2 were found in the wake of opioid withdrawal, supporting the notion that this receptor kinase may act as a molecular switch underlying the transition from abuse to dependence. Therefore, an understanding of the regulation of GRK2 gene expression is of great importance for understanding its function and dysfunction in the brain. Prior evidence suggests that GRK2 gene expression is under the control of multiple signal transduction pathways. Thus, we postulate that different transcription factors and their co-activators/co-repressors may orchestrate the complex transcriptional response to chronic opioids in a cell type-specific and region-specific fashion. In this study, we hypothesize that glucocorticoid receptor (GR) signaling plays a critical role in the MOR-dependent up-regulation of GRK2 in the ventral hippocampus and amygdala. These brain regions are known to be involved in the behavioral aspects of reward processing and addiction. Besides GR, we propose to identify the role of other transcription factors in the regulation of GRK2 expression. The mechanistic involvement of other transcription factors in up- or down-regulation
