Extracorporeal membrane oxygenation (ECMO) has been an established therapy for the management of critical illness respiratory and cardiogenic shock. However, its use for traumatic respiratory failure has been limited because of bleeding and neurologic complications. This report describes the use of a modified ECMO circuit for temporary respiratory support in five patients with severe respiratory failure after trauma. The right internal jugular vein and the carotid artery were used as venous and arterial cannulae, respectively. Under fluoroscopic guidance, all cannulae were introduced with a 90 degrees rotatable tip stylet via a minimally invasive skin incision. The patients could be weaned from the circuit successfully in three of five patients. The parameters required to establish circulatory support were reversed within seven hours in three patients. There were no neurological complications. It was concluded that, under appropriate patient selection, minimally invasive approaches may offer a promising alternative technique for temporary respiratory support during extracorporeal membrane oxygenation. Ever since the United States declared its unilateral nuclear strike capability, Russia has developed new nuclear-powered cruise missiles which have a reportedly impressive range (over 3,500km). The US has also developed a new generation of tactical nuclear weapons that can be used to overwhelm or overwhelm a country's defence systems. How are the four nuclear-powered cruise missiles that Russia has delivered to China improving a country's nuclear strike capability? Russia's first nuclear cruise missile was apparently in service in the late 1980s or early 1990s. While the missile is nominally armed with a high-explosive warhead, the maximum warhead was revealed in 2015
