Q: Why are TPS and TRR not easy to apply in developing countries? I am curious to know why there is no TPS or TRR under developing countries. Is it the lack of confidence among local workers or lack of interest or the entire infrastructure is not there. Does it have to do with the cost of TPS and TRR, or the level of development of the country or something else? A: I think that is more than one factor. Traditionally, in many developing countries, top executives

Insights Math Story: Layout PrintShare with the Reliance CommunityQ: What is the difference between "narrow-minded" and "densely pragmatic"? Webster's defines narrow-minded as: Having narrow or rigid views or opinions. And for dense I have: Marked by or expressed in great detail. Which of them describes better the state a person in that situation? Am I right to believe that "densely pragmatic" could be a more appropriate term than "narrow-minded"? A: Perhaps "densely" is a little too encyclopedic and can lead to questions about one's ability to "see the big picture". You are quite right that narrow-minded might not be the best choice for the situation, I think. Narrow-minded suggests a lack of breadth in one's knowledge and experience while densely pragmatic suggests (too) much understanding of the subject. Instead, perhaps "perverse" could be used for the situation. In any case, the point of your question is that a person with a "perverse" approach to the issue in question is too obstinate, he or she may refuse to change his or her views or worse yet, cause great harm to the community through actions, or comments regarding his or her opinions. For example, if a manager feels strongly that x is a good idea for the company, but every time a candidate for promotion proposes x, he or she flatly refuses to accept it, that is perverse. It may not be narrow-minded, but it is not prudent either.
