Fantasy sports are old hat; the NHL and NBA have been dabbling with them for some time, but games like Fantasy Slots haven't been around as long as the others, and it's still relatively unexplored ground. That, too, could soon change. A major professional hockey team plans to test out a fantasy game next season, according to multiple media reports, even as one NBA team explores the possibility of its own fantasy game in 2015. A fantasy game doesn't feel like a big deal. You pick a team, and you make a little team as good as you can, right? Or maybe not, but it's probably about that simple, anyway. An interesting twist could be introduced, though, if you consider the idea of a fantasy game that pays out real money – and in a way that could be more akin to the recent racetrack games than to more traditional fantasy games. It's a non-zero-sum strategy game, with a twist. Instead of setting your team with stars and building around specific players, you're building teams by picking better lineups to win more games. The better your team does, the more money it makes. Only as you play fantasy hockey games, you're betting that you'll have a better team than other, more experienced players (or that they won't). Only the people in the game can see that you're playing it. Imagine making a little point-spread team. You pick all of your players, and you place a bet on the outcome of every game in the NHL. Then, as the season plays out, you watch as your little point-spread team performs – and see if you guessed right. Imagine if every time you bet on the point spread, you win money. If you find a group of players that you think has the

All-new Weapons, Squads, New Classes and More.

Each Team Fortress 2 worthy class has its own life-giving action, offering distinct ways to approach and overcome your opponents. Alongside new weapons, an innovative formation system allows you to configure your class to fit your play style, and your squad to fit your mission. New levels and special move effects will help players adapt to each character's unique design and play style.

Fight Team Deathmatch or One Team Deathmatch, and win your battle against other teams with new power items, making your fighting experience even more dynamic and exciting.

The battle rush is alive! Teams face off in all-out, adrenaline-pumping battles, where you must fight with speed

Today's high speed memory IC's are typically designed as synchronous memory devices that operate by receiving and responding to externally applied control signals that synchronize the device with an external system bus. The performance of the device is determined by its operating speed, the speed with which it can be instructed to transfer data to or from a system bus and by the maximum data transfer rate between the system bus and the device. One of the limiting factors in the speed with which data can be transferred from a system bus to the memory device is the data input and output timing from the device. Since the data input and output ports of the IC are typically much slower than the external system bus, the data must be captured into the device and then later distributed from the memory device at the proper edge of the clock cycle in order to be properly registered by the system bus. This is known as input/output (IO) latency. This problem is exacerbated when the device is a dual data rate (DDR) device, which must be capable of operating at two different frequencies. The clock frequencies may be the same at the input and output ports, or alternatively the frequency at the output port may be double the input port frequency. One method by which to reduce input/output latency is to incorporate a burst mode of memory transfer in the memory device. In a burst mode of memory transfer, data is sequentially loaded into the device as an ordered sequence of bursts that are distributed on one or more clocks during the data transfer. Each burst in the sequence may be of any predetermined length. One or more addresses are incrementally incremented to address each successive location of the burst sequence. The length of the burst sequence is fixed during device initialization. However, after initialization, the device can operate at any one of a variety of frequencies and burst lengths depending on the system application. In the past, the memory controller or other circuit that programmed the memory device had the burden of knowing the exact burst length and frequency of the device at initialization. When the burst length and frequency of the memory device was changed during operation, the device would not operate properly. Also, memory controllers or other circuits that generated address information to access the memory device had to know the exact length of the burst at initialization, or their generated address information would not be correct. If the memory controller or other circuits improperly programmed the device, the device would not operate properly. Accordingly, there is a need to more readily allow memory devices to be programed to operate at different burst lengths and frequencies. Further,
