Pfizer Shifts Focus to Blue Chip Drugmaker After years of slogging through its patent-protected businesses, drug giant Pfizer (NYS:PFE) said it will focus on its established products like Viagra, Lipitor and Neurontin and drop some of its noncore ventures. Shares of the drugmaker have fallen 13% in the past four months. But Pfizer, which has a market cap of about $166 billion, is one of the best-performing drug stocks on the S&P 500, partly because of the strength of its core businesses. On Tuesday, the company said it will sell its consumer healthcare division to a group of private equity firms led by Carlyle Group (NYS:CG) for $17.5 billion in cash, on a pro-rata basis, to be issued at closing on March 4. The deal, which had been expected, will remove money-losing consumer products from Pfizer's balance sheet. Pfizer's consumer healthcare unit, which makes vitamins and prescription drugs, had a loss of $2.8 billion on $24.9 billion in revenues in the year ending June 27. Pfizer stock rose 2% on the news, and is up more than 5% in the past year to close at $17.71. The company said it will not seek any financing for the deal, which it said will preserve Pfizer's full ownership of the consumer business. The company will pay a $3 billion special cash dividend to shareholders and use the money to reduce debt. Pfizer's new focus is on its blockbuster drugs, which will continue to power its sales as middle-aged and older Americans spend money on life-extending drugs. The company will cut $2 billion in costs by the end of next year, and will stop developing new businesses including a government drug watchdog called the Prescription Drug Monitoring Program, which aims to help prevent fraud. Pfizer has been making large acquisitions to expand its drug pipeline. In May, it bought a drug-development company called Viracor, which it described as an important part of its strategy to become a "leading biopharmaceutical company," adding drugs for genetic diseases, bacterial infections, b7e8fdf5c8
