. Besides that, the current climate of 'Big Data' is one of increasing use of techniques traditionally associated with psychologists: insights drawn from cognitive psychology and cognitive neuroscience. Just to give one example, Bavelier et al. (2014) recently showed that rapid rhythm perception (a form of action observation) could enhance visuo-spatial working memory. This suggests a form of social knowledge transfer that could involve getting insights from others (in the form of music and spoken language) – and using them to improve your own thinking. Personally, I'm very excited about the potential of the field to help us understand how people acquire new beliefs, so I'm not surprised to see it get so much attention on a mass level. As the field continues to develop and there's more research coming out, I think we'll have a much better idea of how to do it and what particular insights we can draw from it.JavaScript is currently disabled.Please enable it for a better experience of Jumi. Collapse of an anti-satellite (ASAT) missile is shown here on October 19, 2007. Credit:Reuters/AP It has been just over a month since the United States military launched two directed-energy weapons (DEWs) against a Russian satellite. Many believed the administration of President Barack Obama would refrain from such action but that has not proved to be the case. Last week, the U.S. Missile Defense Agency (MDA) used two DEWs to destroy an old Russian ASAT missile in low orbit. The DEWs targeted and hit the missile less than three minutes after it was launched from the Plesetsk Cosmodrome in north Russia on February 20, on the heels of a U.S. ground-based interceptor missile shot down a long-range missile target on a launch pad. US President Barack Obama has repeatedly said that he does not want to get involved in the ongoing Russian-Ukrainian conflict, but U.S. officials are now confirming that the DEWs destroyed an ASAT missile (see more below). The three-year-old missile, Kosmos 2519, was a new Russian ASAT, capable of a range of over 9,200 miles. It was first observed on November 20, 2008, by NATO's early warning satellite, Egnat-1. The U.S. early warning satellite, the Defense Support Program (DSP), detected it on February 20 and tracked its activity for several weeks, "monitoring the missile's long-range capabilities," according to The New York Times. In addition to tracking the missile, the U.S. military had the DEWs ready, having previously tested them against simulated targets, according to the paper. Because of the technical capability to target the missile, officials are confident that, had it not been for the DEWs, the missile would have been shot down. On the day that the missile was destroyed, a U.S. Space Command (SPACECOM) official said: "We had a technical solution. We knew where it was going and we had an intercept means. If that missile were to reenter the earth's atmosphere, it could do significant damage." Earlier this month, a second, older Russian ASAT missile was destroyed by U.S. airborne infrared sensors, although the U.S. military has played down the significance of this event. The Pentagon says the U.S. Air Force's Global
