After installation, there is a "Add or Remove Screens" screen that I was not able to find any clue about. Can someone help me? A: You have to go to User Interface → Screens (Figure 1), to open the screens settings dialog (Figure 2). Figure 1. Screens Settings Figure 2. User Interface → Screens There you will be able to change the color of the title bar. Make sure you have not accidentally pressed Caps Lock or NumLock. Q: Are there any Ruby libraries or frameworks for distributed computing? Or in other words, if I want to write a Ruby program that will run on multiple remote systems and will get data from those remote machines and perform tasks on it, is there a standard way to do that? I would consider using any Open Source projects (which are not for a commercial product), but I am interested in pretty standard ways to do that kind of thing in the Ruby ecosystem. For instance: Existing languages and projects are fine as well as "standard library" stuff like the Net::FTP module. The more interesting part is whether or not there are projects that would use distributed computing and can provide some kind of abstractions and "cubbies" for getting data from the remote endpoints as well as some kind of encapsulation for doing common computations, potentially based on what's on the remote endpoints.
