Adrenocortical carcinoma (ACC) can occur in two forms, indolent and aggressive. Management of aggressive ACC relies on cytoreduction of the tumor, control of symptoms, and avoidance of morbidity. We present the results of the use of percutaneous infusion of water-soluble iodinated polymer as a means of localized radioiodine ablation of ACC. A combination of noninvasive and endoscopic percutaneous procedures was used to deliver the iodinated polymer into the adrenal tumor. Computed tomography was used to confirm complete delivery of radioiodine to the tumor and to assess any complications. In this study, 2 of 4 patients with ACC were rendered disease free after 5 to 10 courses of treatment with percutaneous infusion of iodinated polymer. Follow-up to date is 9 months to 2.5 years. Percutaneous infusion of iodinated polymer is a promising method of localized radioiodine therapy for primary ACC. Further investigation is warranted to clarify its role in the management of patients with ACC. Evaluation of a closed-loop peristaltic micropump system for drug delivery. A peristaltic microfluidic pump fabricated with a soft elastomeric material is presented. The pump is driven by a piezoelectric (PZT) actuator that is tightly bonded to a diaphragm actuated by a proximity-controlled solenoid valve. Output flows and resistances are determined by flow chamber geometry, surface treatment and applied voltage. Flow characteristics and pumping performance are investigated in a liquid at rest and in an oscillating medium. Pumping rates of 68 microl h(-1) and flow rates of 14 microl h(-1) with negligible pressure pulsation and frequency response up to 50 kHz have been demonstrated. The pump operates reliably in a 0cc13bf012
