Recently the board software has been updated and there are some known bugs/failures: - Avatars are currently not being displayed✓ FIXED - Tapatalk connection is currently broken✓ FIXED - Avatars cannot be uploaded✓ FIXED I just ordered a Reynolds SLR 18.92mm black carbon path rea. If I want a lightweight and long lasting path, this would be perfect for me. I am looking to have it ground with a 45 degree angle. I have a 1500x45mm oval head and I would like a crosshatch pattern. What is the tension needed to get this to the correct angle? My bike shop here tells me that 15 PSI is ideal but there is no gauge available. Should I be setting at any angle to start? There are two factors I am concerned with: first, what the guitar and the frame are going to do to the fork in this application. I do not know the properties of the material so I do not know what it will or will not do to the fork. I can only gauge that by the appearance, which is not much of a guide. Not sure I'm willing to put a fork on it with just a $6 (plus shipping) fork on it for just $30. Second, and more important, is how much the combination of the fork and the head lock will loosen things up. I would think that you want the angle so the fork is in the same plane as the head tube. For a cross-hatch pattern to work well, it has to be a pretty shallow angle of 45 degrees or less. 45 degrees = 22.5 degrees. The further out of vertical that the fork is from the vertical of the head tube, the shallower the angle has to be. The reason for that is that as the fork is rotated out of the vertical, it has a tendency to also turn the head tube into the other leg of the cross. This will loosen things up. There are also design and manufacturing issues that have to be considered. I would think that you would be working with a more slender diameter fork in place of a fat or chunkier fork. I guess I would suggest that you have the fork done and then decide whether it's worth doing the bike shop's part or not. If they are charging you for one of their forks, they are going to do things to it to see if it works, just like they'd do
